

2022 Annual Report

Dear Friends,

On behalf of our entire organization, I am proud to share NPR's 2022 Annual Report. This past year has been a remarkable journey for us, filled with captivating storytelling, groundbreaking journalism and an unwavering commitment to our mission of providing independent, high-quality news to the public.

In the face of global challenges, NPR rose to the occasion, delivering comprehensive coverage of critical issues. From Russia's invasion of Ukraine and a new era of disinformation, to a rapidly changing climate and a continually evolving society, our journalists diligently reported on the stories and people that shaped our world.

We also expanded our reach and impact like never before. Through innovative partnerships and collaborations, we were able to reach new audiences through multiple platforms, ensuring that NPR remains accessible to all.

Our successes were made possible by you – our dedicated donors and audiences. Your generosity and commitment allowed us to provide programming that informed, educated and entertained. Together, we made a difference in promoting a more knowledgeable society.

As we look towards the year ahead, we are inspired by the opportunities and challenges we face. With you, NPR and Member Stations will continue harnessing our collective power as a network to deliver trusted, world-class journalism, music and culture to engage audiences that reflect America.

Thank you for being an integral part of the NPR family.

Onward!

The war in Ukraine

When Russia launched its attack on Ukraine, NPR journalists were on the front lines, providing first-hand accounts of events as they unfolded. Reporters, including Eleanor Beardsley, Frank Langfitt, Tim Mak and others, contextualized the conflict, helping audiences at home understand the events leading to the invasion, while also illustrating the war’s human costs.

As the war raged on, NPR stuck with the story, offering reporting that covered a broad range of issues, including the disruption of the global food supply chain, international security concerns, broader geopolitical tensions and the displacement of millions of Ukrainians fleeing the war. In 2023, NPR marked the conflict’s anniversary with wide-ranging coverage, including a live recap section that answered reader’s questions. In all of our reporting, we sought to tell the story of the conflict from the perspectives of those living through it and bring a deeper understanding to audiences at home.

Bringing home the world's stories

Last year, in addition to our comprehensive coverage of the war in Ukraine, NPR maintained our commitment to international reporting, sharing stories with audiences at home from every corner of the globe.

This type of reporting is resource intensive, which is why many other news organizations have reduced their international presence.

With donor support, NPR maintains 17 bureaus around the world, allowing us to provide the critical news and storytelling that people need to understand the events shaping our world.

Understanding the rising tension between the United States and China

Throughout the year, NPR journalists covered the strained relationship between the United States and China. From diplomacy efforts and high-level meetings, to curbing access to advanced technology and Nancy Pelosi's controversial trip to Taiwan, your support helped NPR to share the latest in this complex relationship between superpowers.

For 70 years, Queen Elizabeth II served as the constitutional monarch of the United Kingdom, the longest rule in British history. After her death, NPR correspondents were on the ground to share reactions from across the UK and around the world, helping audiences to understand her legacy and what it means for the future of the kingdom.

Powerful visual journalism

NPR's Visuals Team is at the forefront of reimagining public radio's journalism to serve millions of people across digital platforms, including YouTube, Instagram, and through a visual blog entitled The Picture Show. From bite-sized videos on social media, to richly reported documentaries, our efforts are resonating with viewers and introducing a new generation to public media.

We aim to help our audience understand complex global issues – from politics and health, to geopolitics and culture – in ways that are accessible, human, and interesting. NPR couldn't cover the world as it does with groundbreaking, compelling, important, and resonant journalism without the generous support of donors who value international coverage and view it as vital to our audience.

Didi Schanche
CHIEF INTERNATIONAL EDITOR

This year, the White House News Photographers Association honored the NPR Visuals Team for outstanding work in their 2023 's annual 'Eyes of History' contest.

- NPR staff photographer Claire Harbage won 2nd place in the Feature Photography category for her work in Afghanistan on coal mining relying on child labor.
- Photographer Carol Guzy took home top honors as Photographer of the Year for her work in Ukraine for NPR and ZUMA Press.
- The Association also honored Guzy's work in Ukraine for NPR with prizes in the Portrait, Picture Story, Feature, International News and other categories.

Strengthening our democracy

The rise of false information poses an urgent threat to our democracy. It fuels distrust in our institutions, distorts public debate and undermines confidence in our elections, our nation and one another.

With your support, last year NPR launched a team to explore the ways that disinformation is shaping our country's politics, policies and culture. Since then, this team has broken stories, revealed the business models that fuel disinformation and elevated possible solutions. In its coverage of disinformation, NPR aimed to reveal how and why conspiracy theories have become a daily feature of life, while also educating listeners about how to spot and respond to manipulative media.

- The local impacts of disinformation: As false information continues to spread, NPR's disinformation reporting team is partnering with local stations to explore how this problem is affecting lives in communities across the country.

Through 2022, we produced stories in collaboration with Colorado Public Radio, Georgia Public Broadcasting, KPCC/LAist and other Member Stations. This reporting revealed troubling trends and the human cost of this growing problem.

- COVID-19 and the surge of false medical information: Throughout the year, NPR continued to cover the COVID-19 pandemic, including the false information about the illness and its vaccines that continue to proliferate. Examples of this coverage include an in-depth investigation of a woman who died as a direct result of conspiracy theories and a story that explored the black market of alternative COVID medications.

The goal of this team is to cover the harms that happen when people intentionally spread falsehoods and understand why, at this time in particular, this is so much more common than it has been at other points in our history. We want to look at solutions, and we want to identify people and institutions who are spreading disinformation most actively. We want to know which players are the most engaged in making it difficult to have a fact-based discourse in our society and other societies. Thank you to our supporters. I'm so appreciative that they share our commitment to fact-based journalism.

Centering climate change

In October 2022, NPR launched a dedicated Climate Desk to strengthen our coverage of climate and the environment. Led by NPR’s Chief Science Editor Andrea Kissack and Deputy Senior Supervising Climate Editor Neela Banerjee, this eight-person team includes reporters dedicated to specialized beats, including a climate and corporations correspondent and a climate solutions reporter. The new desk also includes a supervising editor that will partner with Member Station reporters to strengthen coverage of climate and the environment locally.

Already, the team has produced high-impact reporting on an array of topics related to our changing climate, including new diseases, food insecurity, the failure of public utilities and forced migration. We are so grateful for your support, which helped launch our Climate Desk, and is allowing public media to cover this critical topic with more depth, breadth and focus than ever before.

NPR Climate Desk Reporter Lauren Sommer reported that outdated rainfall records prevented American cities from adequately bracing for climate-related disasters. In addition, the federal government did not provide funding for updated studies to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA). Following Sommer’s article, NPR learned that NOAA’s 2023 budget includes $429 million for flood forecasting and mapping. This will help agencies in coastal and inland areas become better prepared for disasters.

“NPR used to cover climate more as a science story, and science certainly underpins any kind of analysis of things that happened, like the terrible floods happening in Kentucky for example. But what we’re seeing is that climate change affects everything in our lives. It affects your food, your health, national security, trade, investments — it affects everything.”

Building a stronger, more inclusive public media

This year, we remained steadfast in our commitment to NPR's most important priority: diversifying our audience to reflect, serve, and inspire America. With your support, we made meaningful progress in this work.

Central to our strategy is creating content that allows audiences to see themselves and their communities represented in NPR's reporting and storytelling. We also seek to reach younger and more diverse audiences on the platforms where they are, including social media sites like TikTok, Instagram and others. We are pleased to share some highlights of this work, made possible by you.

Meeting new audiences where they are

Younger and more diverse audiences often encounter NPR for the first time through social media. That's why the work of the NPR Visuals Team to produce compelling journalism and storytelling for these platforms is critical to introducing new audiences to all that public media has to offer.

Oye: uplifting Latinx creatives

In September 2022, NPR and LAist Studios hosted Oye, a talent accelerator designed to connect early-career creators to these powerhouse audio organizations. Over six-weeks, NPR and LAist journalists worked with a small cohort of talented storytellers to develop new programming centering the Latinx experience. The "Born Again" pilot was picked up.

New programs and series

With your support, we created and revamped a wide range of programs to represent more voices and foster a more inclusive space for diverse audiences.

Delving deep into police reform

In July, Embedded hosts Kelly McEvers and Dan Girma partnered with The Marshall Project to give listeners an inside look at the Yonkers Police Department, where the police chief worked to change policing from within, while the federal government tried to push reform from the outside. The four-part series “Changing the Police” explored whether true cultural change is possible in a police department with a decades-long history of misconduct.

Telling a story of immigration and identity that leads to the World Cup

In November, NPR and Futuro Studios partnered to present The Last Cup, a dual language podcast hosted by NPR’s Jasmine Garsd. Timed to coincide with the World Cup, the series shared the journey of Lionel Messi, one of the greatest soccer players in history, from his early days playing soccer in his hometown in Argentina to his arrival at Barça Football Club in Spain. NPR’s first sports-related podcast is available in both English and Spanish, and had a total reach of over 1 million downloads.

Exploring representation in Hollywood

Last fall, Pop Culture Happy Hour’s three-part series “Screening Ourselves” explored calls for better on-screen representation for groups that have been traditionally under- or misrepresented within Hollywood. The program revisited three movies that are now considered classics, The Godfather, Basic Instinct and The Color Purple.

Investigating race, class and power in American schools

Code Switch, NPR’s flagship podcast on race and identity, announced a limited-run series called School Colors, produced in partnership with Brooklyn Deep, a community journalism outlet based in Brooklyn, NY. In its acclaimed first season, the series analyzed how race, class and power shape American cities and schools. In season two, hosts Mark Winston Griffith and Max Freedman took listeners to the most diverse place on the planet—New York City School District 28 in Queens—to find out why the area’s parents opposed a suggested school diversity plan.

Relaunching Alt.Latino

Alt.Latino, a podcast exploring Latino cultures and music genres, relaunched in September with co-hosts Felix Contreras and Anamaria Sayre. The newly imagined show places a focus on artist conversations, delving deep into the stories shaping the music, shining a light on the culture, heritage and struggles of the Latinx community.

Celebrating Latinx heritage through ‘El Tiny’

To recognize Hispanic Heritage Month, NPR’s Tiny Desk hosted its second annual ‘El Tiny’ takeover in September, featuring performances from an array of artists from across the Spanish-speaking world. Artists including Jessie Reyez, Susana Baca, Carla Morrison and more. ‘El Tiny’ is part of a broader effort to reach and serve Hispanic and Latinx audiences.

The NPR Network

npr Expanding the NPR and Member Station Partnership Network

The NPR Network is a vision for public media’s future. It strengthens the partnership between NPR and Member Stations to better serve communities, reach new and more diverse audiences, and grow support for our public service mission. With elements impacting sponsorship, podcasting, marketing and fundraising, the NPR Network is not a project, but a new way of operating.

At a time when audience habits are changing and the economics of media are shifting, the NPR Network prepares public media to thrive in an on-demand world. It will align NPR and stations around shared goals and strategies, and help us to operate as a cohesive local-national network. This work, and all that we do, is made possible by you.

Creating a sustainable future for public media

In the past year, NPR and Member Stations launched several innovative programs designed to realize the collaborative vision of the NPR Network, many of which drive audience and revenue to stations. Some of those projects include:

- NPR Network donation: An option for digital audiences to give to support the public media network as a whole on NPR platforms, creating a pathway to membership for NPR’s digital audience of 34 million weekly users. After launching in November 2022, 3,600 people gave to the NPR Network in the first two months.

The NPR Politics Podcast Live from Buckhead Theatre in Atlanta, Georgia on October 20th, 2022. Photo by Josephine Figueroa for NPR.

- The NPR Podcast Network: 50 stations are participating in this pilot, which provides shared branding and cross-promotion for public media podcasts. In the first week after Seattle station KUOW joined, they saw nearly 800 listeners delivered to their podcast Seattle Now from NPR Network advertising.
- The NPR+ podcast bundle: Launched in November with 33 pilot stations, the NPR+ bundle provides an ad free experience to new members of Member Stations. The NPR+ podcast bundle attracted 500 new donors to public radio in the first two months and now includes Up First and NPR News Now, with additional offerings coming in 2023.

On the air, online, and in our workplaces, staff at Member Stations and NPR are harnessing our collective power as a network to deliver trusted, world-class journalism, music, and culture to inform, empower, and engage audiences that reflect America. We Are the NPR Network!
